When book designers or typographers talk about the “color” of a page of type, they don’t mean the colors printed on the page. In fact, this term often comes up in discussing purely black and white typographic layouts. In this case, “color” means the overall gray tone of tall column of type that constitutes almost all book pages.

Digital art is usually created to suit either screens or printers. RGB is best for artwork created to be viewed on screens, as it manages color the same way screens do: by seeing each color as a unique combination of red, green, and blue.. CMYK is the best option for artwork destined for print. This sees each color as a mix of cyan, magenta, yellow, and black, matching the four ink colors used ...
